How the information is handled

The information you give us is assessed by Finantsinspektsioon staff, and we will guarantee confidentiality for it if you want.

You may be asked for further information if you have given your contact details and agree to answer additional questions. It is often important that we gather additional information, and so we ask you to share your contact details with us if you can.

If the information you give us leads us to suspect that the law has been broken, our options for legal action include starting misdemeanour proceedings or informing the prosecutor and the police of the criminal act.

Your rights if you inform us about an illegal activity

The person notifying about a breach of the law has the right to remain anonymous. The fact that the information has been given may only be revealed with the written consent of the informer. Confidentiality of the notification is however not guaranteed if the informant has knowingly submitted false information.

By law, anyone giving Finantsinspektsioon information under the market abuse regulations is not breaking any confidentiality agreement or the limits imposed by legal or administrative standards, and so holds no liability as a result of sharing this information.

Notification of a suspicion does not necessarily mean in every case that the law has actually been broken. If the informer gives the notification in good faith and does not knowingly give false information, in order to mislead deliberately for example, then they have no liability for the notification.

Those notifying about breaches of the law need to be protected against unfair treatment, discrimination and revenge. To protect your rights you can contact a legal adviser, and you can find one from the website of the Estonian Bar Association.

If you want, Finantsinspektsioon can issue you with confirmation of your status as a whistleblower, if you reveal your identity and need this confirmation in a labour dispute.

Finantsinspektsioon can if needed give further explanations about the receipt and processing of the information.
